CATME Five Teamwork Dimensions

There are five CATME teamwork dimensions that contribute to the effectiveness of teams. The CATME Peer Evaluation describes behaviors typical of various levels of performance in each of the CATME Five Teamwork Dimensions. Raters select the category of behaviors that most closely matches the behavior of each student on their team (including themselves). Students can practice using the system with hypothetical team members in a feature called Rater Practice.

Contributing to the Team’s Work

Contributing to the Team’s Work is defined as helping the team achieve its goals or objectives by completing the assigned tasksYour behaviors influence the quality and quantity of your contribution to the team. The following is the rating scale in peer evaluation for contributing to the team's work.

Having Relevant Knowledge, Skills, and Abilities

Knowledge skills and abilities or KSA's are knowing what you need to know, knowing how to do what you need to do, and having the capabilities you need to do the work of the team. Effective team members need to have or learn the necessary KSA's for their assigned tasks and should be prepared to perform other roles if needed. The following describes different levels of characteristics that may happen on your team work.

CATME Rating Scale

The CATME Rating Scale is a useful handout for instructors and students who need a clear and concise way to view the CATME Five Teamwork Dimensions and the criteria associated with them. In our experience, students have a much harder time differentiating the top-performing team members from average team members. This scale helps to emphasize the criteria that our teamwork model is based on. It excels as a complement to taking a peer evaluation survey and can serve as a quick reminder to students when they are evaluating their peers.
